The mother loves her son. The father is a mean drunk. After a hard round of drinking, in a fit of rage the father kills the mother. The son hears the entire process but cannot help her. Fear has gripped his heart and he is unable to move.

Bob Rydel, the 15 year old son, retreats to the basement of their Nevada home where his imagination allows him to finish a time machine he had been constructing. He calls forward U.S. Marshal J.B. Sessions from the latter 1800's, along with his six deputies, all very capable men.

In the 1800's, Sessions has been commissioned by a priest to bring Alan Rydel to justice. The quest follows the marshal through the portal of time. What he doesn't realize is that he is no longer in the 1800's

The priest required that Alan Rydel be hung from a cross in front of the church. The church itself could not withstand the test of time but the cross did. Sessions manages to complete the task for which he had been hired.

Bob Rydel's uncle places him in a mental health clinic suitable for a teenage boy. The doctor feels the entire story about Sessions is a product of a young mind tormented by an abusive father. When the doctor finally declares the boy fit to return home, his mind has taken on a totally new personality.
